

Lead Self Domain Assignment (Part 1)

How might your awareness of your personal values and their influence change your approach to decision-making when working with others?

Becoming truly aware of my core values—specifically accountability, fairness, and compassion—has been a turning point for me. It shifted my decision-making from a reactive process into a deliberate practice. In the fast-paced environment of a community pharmacy, it is easy to let immediate pressures, like a long queue or a stressed team, dictate actions. However, knowing that accountability is my anchor allows me to pause in these moments. When I face pressure to rush a technical check, this value acts as a mental stop-sign, reminding me that patient safety must always take precedence over speed.

Furthermore, embracing fairness and compassion has changed how I interact with the assistants I supervise. Previously, I might have viewed a dispensing error strictly as a performance failure. Now, I look at it through the lens of fairness, prompting me to ask if the system supported them or if there were gaps in training. This ensures that my guidance is educational rather than punitive.

By explicitly linking my decisions to these values, I can explain the "why" behind my actions more effectively. Instead of just saying "no" to a request, I can articulate that the decision is rooted in a commitment to integrity. This invites the team to align with those standards rather than feeling personally critiqued, ensuring my leadership is consistent and genuinely respected.
